

Michelle Sparrow:

The district attorney's office has the ability to press charges, obviously, or when someone's arrested for something, they could find out, through evidence and discovery and the police reports and speaking with witnesses, et cetera, that there are other charges that should be forthcoming or that charges should be elevated. Let's say that someone's assaulted and then, they end up dying, for instance. Or someone's assaulted, and at first, it's a simple assault, but it involves a serious injuries. So they could escalate that. Yes, they can do that.